

4 Most Common Podcasting Issues

1. The Cost of Getting Started

Most people start with a webcam and a cheap microphone when recording their first podcast episode. Multiple camera angles and audio that doesn't embarrass you can push a home setup past $20,000. You close the browser tab and promise to revisit it next quarter.

2. The Work Behind the Scenes

Sometimes running a podcast can feel like you've got a second job. You probably don't want to spend a Tuesday evening working out why the camera lost focus, plus the two hours of editing for every hour you film, and a consistent posting schedule.

3. The Pressure to Get It Right

You wouldn't open a second location without a business plan, so recording without a complete show plan feels reckless. That planning turns into research. You watch other shows and bookmark formats, and the recording date keeps getting postponed.

4. The Fear of Being on Camera

Filler words and the sound of your own voice can be hard to sit through. Then comes the worry about looking foolish in front of the clients you want to impress. A flat, poorly lit clip of yourself can end the project before it starts.

Presented by:
TheRookeryStudio.com

ROOKERY STUDIOS

Image Source:
chatgpt.com (AI-generated)