

6 Things to Expect at Podcast Studios

1. A Prepared Studio

In most professional studios, you don't have to set anything up. The room should already be lit, with microphones and cameras in place. Some studios offer different backgrounds, so pick the one that feels most comfortable to you.

2. A Short Conversation Before Recording

Before recording, the studio team may ask what you plan to cover and who is joining you. This takes just a few minutes. You don't need a script, as many people find that following a basic outline helps them sound less stilted.

3. Behind the Scenes Support

All you really have to do is sit down and talk. Someone from the team watches the audio levels and camera angles the entire time. You may feel strange at first, but that often fades, and filler words can be addressed during editing.

4. Help With the Unexpected

Maybe you stumble over a sentence or spill a drink. You usually don't have to start over; just take a breath and pick the thought back up. Because the team watches levels live, they should catch microphone or camera problems as they happen.

5. A Smooth Finish

When you finish, the team confirms every microphone and camera angle recorded and the files are saved. Then the editing team cuts between angles, cleans up the audio, and removes the stumbles, so you aren't learning editing software.

6. You Don't Have To Do It All

Your responsibility is generally just talking about something you already know well. The lights, levels, angles, and cleanup often belong to someone else, so you can have a professionally produced podcast for your business.

Presented by:
TheRookeryStudio.com

ROOKERY STUDIOS

Image Source:
chatgpt.com (AI-generated)